Home Drug Infusion Therapy Under Medicare In many cases, smaller providers may offer only one or two components of the therapy directly. A patient from a small town who is on HDIT, for example, might receive infusion-related nursing from the local HHA, pharmacy products and services from the local pharmacy, and an infusion pump from the local medical equipment dealer. In fact, it appears that many HDIT providers contract with at least one other type of provider to provide some components of the therapy. Where patients need routine as well as infusion specialty nursing, the routine nursing is almost always performed by a separate agency ( except where the HHA itself is also the primary home infusion provider ) ( see figure I-1 ). The continually expanding revenues and, apparently, relatively high profit margins that have been enjoyed by the HDIT industry thus far have facilitated and encouraged the entry of new providers into the marketplace, expanding access to HDIT services and stimulating the development of new products. The increasing revenues are in part due to the liberal Photo credit: CADD-PCA Ambulatory Infusion Pump Model 5800, Pharmacia Deltec Inc. , St. Paul, MN reimbursement that these companies have often been able to garner. Future controls over what companies Sophisticated infusion pumps have been developed for can charge Medicare patients for home infusion specific segments of the HDIT market. This pump delivers a constant dose of pain medication, with a special therapy might slow the growth of certain sectors of button that allows the...
